Detail

Ghana Shyam Latua is a contemporary artist known for his landscape paintings which he creates using novel pinprick techniques. A student of Visva-Bharati in Santiniketan, Latua's artistic journey is steeped in a profound appreciation for the unspoiled beauty of nature, tinged with a palpable sense of sorrow over its gradual erosion at the hands of rampant urbanisation and unchecked tourism. His formative years at Santiniketan were marked by a deep immersion in the works of luminaries such as Nandalal Bose, Benodebehari Mukherjee, and Ramkinkar Baij, whose artistry served as both a source of inspiration and a catalyst for his evolving aesthetic sensibilities. Initially drawn to the serene landscapes and pastoral scenes that characterised the oeuvre of his predecessors, Latua's artistic trajectory took a decisive turn as he delved deeper into the complexities of contemporary socio-environmental issues. There is a transition from his earlier concept of romantic geography to political geography in which nature is both destroyed and maintained by modern society. At the heart of Latua's artistic vision lies a profound sense of responsibility—a commitment to witness the unpleasant transformations unfolding in the landscape and, by extension, in society's collective consciousness. His paintings serve as a mirror, reflecting the beauty of the natural world while simultaneously reminding us to contemplate the urgency of its preservation.

Latua's departure from the conventional representation of Santiniketan's landscape epitomises a departure from the romanticised depictions that historically dominated artistic renderings of the locale. Through a meticulous dissection of the picturesque, Latua endeavours to interrogate the socio-political undercurrents pervading the terrain, thus transcending the mere portrayal of aesthetic beauty to delve into the intricate tapestry of power dynamics and environmental degradation. Emerging as a bastion of artistic and intellectual exchange over a century, Santiniketan has metamorphosed from a pristine and uninhabited expanse into a crucible of shared communal identity.

Latua's departure from the conventional representation of Santiniketan's landscape epitomises a departure from the romanticised depictions that historically dominated artistic renderings of the locale. Through a meticulous dissection of the picturesque, Latua endeavours to interrogate the socio-political undercurrents pervading the terrain, thus transcending the mere portrayal of aesthetic beauty to delve into the intricate tapestry of power dynamics and environmental degradation. Emerging as a bastion of artistic and intellectual exchange over a century, Santiniketan has metamorphosed from a pristine and uninhabited expanse into a crucible of shared communal identity.

Central to Latua's oeuvre is his innovative pinprick technique, which deftly ruptures the tactile surface of the image plane, symbolically mirroring the fractured state of the landscape under siege. The fusion of inked elements with spectral, white pinpricked motifs within his compositions creates a multifaceted sensory experience, both tactile and visual. This technique elucidates the dynamic relationship between the artwork's foundation and imagery and the interplay between presence and absence. This approach serves as a conduit for exploring the dialectics inherent in the intersection of nature and culture, poignantly commenting on contemporary political and ecological concerns.

Ghana Shyam was deeply fascinated by the landscape paintings of the Santiniketan artists when he first saw them as a student of Kala Bhavana. In his paintings of Khoai, he, however, has consciously chosen not to follow the tradition of the Santiniketan artists, for the sublime presence that once inspired the artists and poets of Santiniketan is now largely lost and threatened by the rapid spread of tourism and urbanization.

Khoai* in Bengali refers to a lateritic landform in the Rarh region of Bengal, the eroded and arid land surrounding Santiniketan. Spreading to the horizon on all directions, the rural beauty of the vast, undulated and sparsely timbered Khoai attracted the early Santiniketan artists. They produced a large body of paintings and drawings, transforming the geographical features into a landscape trope, in which the scopic and aesthetic imagination of the self, place and nature are inextricably intertwined.

Ghana Shyam Latua's group of carefully executed monochromatic landscapes on paper are constructed of scratches, with webs of delicate lines floating in a void. The landscape is in motion; in particular, the visceral red undulating laterite sites of Birbhum district in Bengal are central to his work, transforming these works into speculative mappings of change.

Despite the meticulous nature of his artistic process, Latua's creative journey extends far beyond the confines of his studio. His dedication to observing and studying nature and its various forms underscores his commitment to authenticity and depth in his work. Each piece is a testament to his lived interaction with the natural world, imbued with a reverence and intimacy that resonates with the spectators on many levels. Thus, while Latua may spend considerable time perfecting each artwork, his creations are not merely products of solitary introspection but reflections of a rich and ongoing dialogue with the world around him.

‘Through my works, I try to explore the spiritual affinity and relationship between man and nature. By getting divorced from nature day by day, we have murdered our own divine and spiritual self.’
